Selected Poetry

THE BRINLY PLOW.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT

We've read it—a heart stirring call.

For farmers all around;

To have two ears of wheat to smile

Where now but one is found;

With more, much more of previous corn.

And grass that they have now;

All which is true, this it will do.

The patient Brinly Plow.

We've read it—a just recognition.

And heartily dressed;

For action and for eloquence;

"Twill neighbor with the best;

To which we'll add, it truth unfolds.

Sends praise to where its due:

Unlike the verse poets release.

Domestic and entire.

We've read it—Childe Harold blaze;

No other sublime stuff.

Tending to make the reading world

Worse, when it has enough;

But an edition of kind praise.

Or transient sun in Warm as meridian beam.

Notion of this writing age.

Or an illusive theme

We've read it—no Abolitionism.

Or Harper's Ferry fray.

Torred and scorched North and South,

Bringing blood and dismay;

Not a's transcendent flash;

Much pleasure both in

We thank thee for it, and again

For this so well expressed.

That all who try the Brinly Plow.

Indorse it as the best.

FISHERVILLE, KY. H. P. B.

THE CONSUMTIVE'S DREAM.

It was a modest, lowly cottage wherein resided Mrs. Hastings and her two daughters.

It was a lowly hut neat and comfortable room in which the younger now lay on her death-bed.

Pure and spotless as were the simple bed-chambers, they were more so than the heart of Mary Hastings.

No evil therein ever found at home.

Well had its portals been guarded, and if perchance, evil thoughts came, as come they will to all,

they thought not of them, but of the good that they would do, and therein abide.

This day, eighteen years ago, life first dawned upon her pathway; and this very birthday was to have been her bridal one. Ah, more the bride of heaven looks she now than for one of earth. O God! spare her yet a little while.

Mother called a sweet low voice.

In a moment the mother stood beside her,

softly parting the hair from the broad, pale brow

that she had so often kissed in infancy and childhood.

"What, my child?"

The mother's voice trembled as she spoke.

There was a heart-quake in it, as though the source were overflowing with tears.

"Do not laugh at me, mother dear, when I tell you my last night's dream. I had lain quietly thinking of Edward, and of this that was to be my bridal day.

I yearned oh, so ardently to see him but once again,

only once, mother, that I might receive his parting kiss and his last fondly spoken 'Good-by.' All at once a strange sensation came over me. I felt as strong and well as ever; and, mother, as surely as I now speak to you,

I heard his voice distinctly saying in the dear old voice, 'Mary, tomorrow is our bridal day. I come, oh, I come for my long-promised treasure! The voice died away in a sweet cadence. Nay, mother, do not weep. I know I shall see him once again, and be clasped to his fond and faithful heart.

O mother do not weep when I am so unspeakably happy! Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me!

Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me!

Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me!

Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me! Oh, do not part with me!
